A Note From the Teachers:

It's been so busy in the Willow classroom! Students are almost through the normalization process: learning how to manage time, observe periods of silence, work on alternate tasks while waiting for help, and making sure to try a task with the appropriate materials before asking for help. In fact, it's important throughout one's life to try and problem solve before asking for help. In doing so, we often find that we have the answers by using common sense or through our experiences. In turn, we gain the satisfaction in having come up with a solution on our own. This is a skill that we foster in Willow every day. Ask your student sometime, what she/he has done that day in order to problem solve a situation that was difficult. It will be a great time to talk about her/his successes and/or needs in the area of problem solving.
